The new layering assistant is another helpful boost to the workflow editor. It lets you assign to specific layer groups (layers, masks, fills, and other custom configurations of layers and masks). It also allows you to group layers for purposes of setting visibility, blending, turning on or off layers/masks, and for other purposes. This feature is pretty great if you use Photoshop for design work, especially if you need to change the layers of a pre-defined mask. With the newly implemented smart object feature in Photoshop, you can extract content from images and other files into images, such as full stop (period), em dash (-), hash mark (#), degree symbol (°), ampersand (&), less than, and greater than. For people who like to work with HTML and CSS, this is really cool.

The first thing you notice is that it is a tad bit faster than 4.5.2. It must be this new Photoshop CC release, because no other new functionality presented here is faster than before. You can make quick work of showing and hiding layers, for example. This release is a bit more opaque than Lightroom, and Lightroom is now more like Photoshop than ever. For example, you now have options to make selections with a box, arrow, polygon, or polyline. You can even expand the selection region with any of these means. The new magic wand is also a vital tool. You can now choose to make a selection from that which is lit, only from that which is closed, or anywhere from the active channel within a specified color group. It might be more powerful than an eyedropper. You can also use the new Eyedropper tool to immediately deselect the rest of the image when you want to get one specific color. It's a great time saver. It's not as easy to work with the new arbitrary curves tool, but it's still helpful when it comes to changing the curve of an image to keep it in balance. If you've ever posed for a picture, you're familiar with the idea of curves.
